Mayor says city ready to move

Civic center design committee presents its recommendations

Mayor Ben Barnett said Wednesday Rapid City and the state have come to an agreement on the future of the Civic Center. The mayor’s council cause will be to hold a hearing on the recommendation of the committee and present it to the city council for its consideration.

While the commission was not formed to examine the civic center, it was tasked with recommending what kind of improvements should be made to the center. The commission was also given the task of examining the plans for the proposed Civic Center.

It was also indicated that the committee has been formed to address the needs of the community and that the commission’s recommendations were to be directed to the city council for its consideration.

The committee recommended that the commission take a comprehensive look at the city’s facilities and that the commission’s recommendations be directed to the city council for its consideration.

Mayor takes rail, PUC officials on crossing tour

Repair of one railroad crossing by the railroad company and the state was the topic of the tour on Wednesday. The railroad company has been working on the crossing for several years.

The railroad agreed to make improvements, including replacing the crossing signal and signals, but the city has not yet received a plan.

Mayor Ben Barnett said the city had received a plan for the repair, but the city has not yet received a plan for the repair.

The mayor said the repair is not a priority for the city, and that the city will have to wait for the railroad to make the repairs.
