Talk about buying a "pig in a poke," connecting the existing civic community center facility has progressed Mayor Dan Hertzig in order to offer as much of a "word picture" as possible at the time.

Harnett and Saturday he contemined a number of the proposed facility because it has been designed yet. And it will not be designed until the voters approve the city's action in residing the city sales tax

The new tax proposal, which is connected to be injected with current funding the referenda movement, is designed to help finance the construction of the facility and part of the action will continue to provide maintenance and support for the current facility. The money will be spent to pay the construction of the facility or other expenses until the bond issue passes.

"It was a stupid person who said that a building would make the city," he said. "That is the last time I have sponsored the referendum on that issue. We want the people to understand that the entire project - before we commit valuable tax dollars - have been added and taken care.

However, he noted that a detailed study authorized by a citizens committee and the city officials, involving a review of facilities in other communities, to show up with a "bullet" estimate of the cost and a "concept" of what needed in the way of a civic "complect facility.

The city is considering a 16,000 square foot building with a gymnasium space capable of seating between 2,000 and 2,400. According to the committee, the facility would be designed with a multipurpose area to be used as a gymnasium or for other purposes as needed.

Airport notes seasonal dip in traffic

Commercial airline passengers used the New City Airport in January, but the number dropped to 2,200 in December. Last year the airport handled 2,700 passengers per month. The drop in traffic is due to the decrease in scheduled service by regular airlines.

According to statistics compiled by the city's police department, there were 159,000 passengers handled in January compared with 200,000 in December. The drop in traffic has not affected the airport's operations as it has been able to maintain its service level.
